Unfolding of GFP in retinitis pigmentosa. The fluorescence recovery after photobleaching (FRAP) technique is used to measure the apparent diffusion coefficient (D_{app}) of GFP in the photoreceptor cells of Retinitis pigmentosa (RP) patients. The obtained D_{app} is a result of the combination of two conflicting processes, namely (a) the motion of a subpopulation of the molecules (termed photochemical trapping process) and (b) the motion of the different subpopulations of molecules (termed molecular diffusion process). In the present study, the D_{app} of RP patients was measured and the FRAP curves are analyzed using two models: (a) a double exponential decay model and (b) a model that describes the process using an equation that includes one rapid diffusion process and one slow diffusion process. The D(app) of the RP patients is within the range of the normal values. Despite having the same D(app), the FRAP

You have to edit the /lib/old/theme/startmenu.ini and the /lib/skin/custom_theme/fr.xml files. This is very easy to do by pressing Alt+F7 and then the right mouse button. You will have a file open with your text editor. Look for the "help" file. A new right-click menu will give you choices. "open" gives you the "help" file, but you will need to add to the end of this file: This changes the location of the new start menu. This is easy to change, just leave the same file open and press F8, then the right mouse button, to change it. There are some further changes that are made to the fr.xml file. You must do this manually, but it is almost the same as the "open" file.

(Reuters Health) - Young adults with major depression should get the same thorough investigation of their head injuries and post-traumatic stress disorder as they would for major depressive disorder, a U.S. study suggests. "There's a saying that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, and that's true here," said lead author Harry Boorman, of the psychiatry department at Geisinger Commonwealth School of Medicine in Danville, Pennsylvania. "As best we can, we should make people aware of the issues with their head injuries and the connection they may have with depression." Major depressive disorder is the
