I've made a form with several input fields in HTML, when the user enters some details, a bunch of objects (say 3) are made and then sent to the server. The object is just a simple representation of the data the user entered, something along the lines of: object { id; name; country; phone; } It's meant to be a simple way to send more information to the server than straight fields. When I receive the objects back in PHP, I send the objects to a database with a unique key, now I've been using a serialized($object) approach to finding the objects, but I'm not sure this is the best way. Would there be a better way of doing this? I'd also be interested in what JS libraries are out there, so I can investigate further. Thanks A: Would there be a better way of doing this? You can use the Multi-Part form and send the actual objects themselves along with the HTML form. Doing it this way will eliminate the need for a separate JavaScript library on the client side.
